the better known types of birds and has presented them in an entirely informal manner, giving their common names, a brief description of size, color, nest, etc., and a series of simple observations and anecdotes concerning each. The numerous illustrations are very good. The general character of the book makes it unsuitable as a text, but it would be a very useful addition to a schoolroom library.

A series of travel stories of life in the Holy Land is provided in a recent book¹ which is designed primarily for classes in religious education. The narrative structure is interesting, and the facts presented are well chosen. It is written for children at the upper-grade level. The general content, as well as the selection of illustrations, make the book of considerable value for supplementary use.
